The Good News
Health and Solidarity

For the last three months, we have been joined together in solidarity against a previously unknown enemy: COVID-19. We've sheltered in solidarity, worked in solidarity and donned masks to protect others. We did it for health. We did it to save lives. We did it together.

Now many of us are participating in another act of solidarity - to protest the tragedy that happened in Minneapolis, that happened to a man named George Floyd. Because it happened, period.

In a letter signed by all county department heads this week, County leaders wrote, "It is up to us to be the change we want to see, to be the solution." While that philosophy has long been linked with social change, it is also what has helped us flatten the curve against coronavirus. We changed our lives to meet a serious health threat and our behavior became the solution.

Now, many are setting aside safety in favor of protest to call out the pandemics we know: racism and injustice. This freedom of expression is deeply held, so much so that the state notes it on its COVID19 California website, asking protesters to limit attendance, wear masks and practice social distancing, particularly when it comes to first responders. <https://covid19.ca.gov/stay-home-except-for-essential-needs/#top>

If you protest, please do it safely. Gatherings bring us together for a common cause but also create an environment for wider virus transmission. Don't lose the progress our community has made in fighting COVID-19. Follow safety guidelines as much as you can. A masked voice is still a powerful one. Take a page from our Shelter in Place playbook and try being 'Together Apart' when protesting.

Let's come out of this heartbreaking, terrible time in good health so we can make the changes we envision and be well enough to enjoy them.
